INTRODUCTION:

Ever notice how kids toys, television programs, comic books and other products involving specific characters are build on enormous, elaborate frameworks of intergalactic politics and conflict, fantastic races of people and animals and complicated methods for determining right and wrong?

When we set out to design characters for our new line of Somethingspace something for children, we were stunned by the amount of back-story groundwork that had to be done. Stunned and, we admit, discouraged. That is, until we realized that an untapped framework already existed; one that already included rules of right and wrong, bizarre creatures and years of conflict. That framework was the cosmic world of astrology!

By dividing our zodiac into good guys, the Hyper-Space battlers, and bad guys, the Nega-Space battlers, along with vehicles and other cosmic entities, we were able to quickly and efficiently swipe an entire universe in which our children's products could exist, complete with existing character traits for all of its inhabitants.

The best part about Intergalactic Zodiac Space-Battlers, however, is that they are an effective educational tool. While your children play at space-battling, they'll also learn about how their day might go, as well as who they should let pick them up at a bar.
